

MAKING THE MOST OF A TIGHT TRAINING BUDGET

Having chatted to many of our existing clients over the last couple of weeks – it is obvious that the ever increasing world of economic uncertainty has resulted in ‘starved training budgets’ for all, regardless of sector or service. I know I’m talking to the converted, when I say that supporting leaders to be their best and to get the best out of those they lead, is money well spent and even more important in harder more demanding times. But that doesn’t answer the question of how to make the most out of a training budget that has been a major casualty of cutbacks?

Having chatted to many of our existing clients over the last couple of weeks – it is obvious that the ever increasing world of economic uncertainty has resulted in ‘starved training budgets’ for all, regardless of sector or service. I know I’m talking to the converted, when I say that supporting leaders to be their best and to get the best out of those they lead, is money well spent and even more important in harder more demanding times. But that doesn’t answer the question of how to make the most out of a training budget that has been a major casualty of cutbacks?

An excellent way of getting the most out of a limited budget, is to define what ‘leading in hard times’ means within the organisational context and then focus managers on those behaviours. 360 feedback is of course an economic and fast way of realigning behavioural expectations to ensure tomorrows success.

David
Director

